Neuropsychological impairment in Alzheimer's disease: firstly, how can we identify it? Neuropsychological impairment is a well-established feature of Alzheimer's disease. Historically, it has been considered a behavioural manifestation of the underlying neuropathology. Nowadays, it can also be seen as a direct consequence of amyloid deposition and tau pathology.

The often observed relationship between neuropsychological deficits and several pathological measures (e.g., amyloid, tau) should not be overinterpreted. Furthermore, neuropsychological impairment may merely be a part of a general process of cognitive aging. In this review article, we discuss the various aspects of cognitive impairment in Alzheimer's disease, with a particular focus on neuropsychological impairment, and we attempt to identify possible clinical and methodological approaches to the identification and evaluation of neuropsychological impairment. As in other diseases, neuropsychological impairment in Alzheimer's disease should be better understood as a continuum between different outcomes. Further cognitive tests might be considered as important add-ons to the standard clinical testing battery. They might also have prognostic value for the outcome of patients with dementia.
